"We're certainly at the stage where you, if you are a scientist before it appears in CDC's" and WHO's top official in China, Dr. Gauden Galea, referring to the same system in General Victorian, in another meeting.

The story behind the early response to the virus comes at a time when the U.S. health agency is under siege, and has agreed to an independent probe of how the pandemic was handled globally. President Donald Trump has threatened to withdraw U.S. funding for the agency, which he says WHO is too under the illegally colluding with China to hide the extent of the coronavirus crisis. He has set with the representatives on Friday, jeopardizing the agreement's fate within the U.S. Congress, which must approve the funding.

In the meantime, Chinese President Xi Jinping has vowed to hold to do full and transparent work given to fight the coronavirus, saying China has always provided information to WHO and the world "in a most timely fashion."

The new information does not support the narrative of either the U.S. or China, but instead underscores how both sides have sought to control information, and how the U.S. government hastily dismissed, although international has allegic complaints to its response to WHO that could have an impact on public health, the U.S. agency has no enforcement power and relies on cooperation from member governments, which sometimes. Instead, it must rely on the cooperation of member states.

The recordings suggest that rather than colluding with China, as Trump declared, WHO was itself at the mercy of the Communist Party in the international community. Its Director, the agency's chief, did try to portray China in the best light, likely as a means to secure more information, but WHO officials also were pressing China to share information, and WHO was ultimately forced to decrease its relationship collaborating with China for the course of the coronavirus crisis.
