Since December 2019, our committee has carried out monitoring respiratory diseases and related diseases, and found unexplained viral pneumonia cases. The clinical manifestations of the cases are mainly fever, a small number of patients have difficulty breathing, and chest radiography is infiltrating in both lungsions. As of 8:00 on January 3, 2020, a total of 44 patients diagnosed with unexplained viral pneumonia have been found, including 11 severe cases, and the vital signs of the rest of the patients are generally stable. At present, all cases are isolated and treated in Wuhan medical institutions. 121 close contacts have been tracked for parallel medical observation, and the tracking of close contacts is still in progress.

Epidemiological investigations show that some cases are operated by South China Seafood City in Wuhan. So far, preliminary investigations have shown that no obvious human-to-human evidence has been found, and no medical personnel have been found to be infected. Pathogen identification (including nucleic acid detection and virus isolation and culture) and etiological traceability are in progress, and common respiratory diseases such as influenza, avian influenza and adenovirus infection have been excluded.

After the outbreak of the epidemic, the national and provincial health commissions attached great importance to it and sent working groups and expert groups to Wuhan to guide the local epidemic response and disposal. Wuhan Municipal Health Commission has carried out relevant case searches and retrospective investigations in medical institutions in the city, and has completed the environmental sanitation disposal of South China Seafood City, and further health investigations are under way.
